Canelo Alvarez Vs Terence Crawford

Was the boxing fight a whole scam?

Looking at past Canelo's fights, each time he would lose, his fans would believe it was bought. In this fight with Crawford, Crawford simply beat him due to how sharp, fast and slick moves he's known for.

Unfortunately, looking at Canelo's past matches, he tends to struggle with slick fighters like Lara, Floyd, and Bivol whom all these guys have great footwork.

It could be that Canelo is just not in his prime anymore? Could be....But did you hear?

This is not his first allegation. Canelo has had multiple accusations over the years of his losses just being fixed games. Furthermore social media has begun to expand on that by bringing up past fights like: Canelo VS Terrence and Canelo Vs Banavidez to further expand on this idea.

In the most recent fight Canelo Vs Crawford many fans were quick to say that Canelo was clearly off his game to explain away his loss. Other fans claimed that this was a purposeful move because despite not being the champion Canelo still received an estimated 150 million dollars.

Many Canelo fans speculate it was one of his past bought fights. This includes the fact that he wasn't active as usual and saw signs the entire match. Suspicions also arose when Adin Ross: a streamer, while he was reacting to the fight, changed his bet from Canelo to Crawford with 1 million dollars on the line. He stated, "I can't talk about it, just go Crawford." Conspiracy and deception surround his latest fight, was it fixed or not.... That for you to decide.

Until next time dear reader,
yel&elle

The Monthly Scream: Escalator Politics at the UN

At the recent United Nations General Assembly, former President Donald Trump found himself in the center of attention – not for his speech, but for a stalled escalator. As Trump and former First Lady Melania entered the building, the moving staircase froze beneath them, creating a moment equal parts awkward and symbolic.

The UN later clarified that the stop was triggered by a safety sensor after a cameraman moved backwards on the machine. To Trump, however, this was no accident. He quickly claimed the malfunction, along with issues with his teleprompter and audio, were acts of "sabotage." The Secret Service has since reviewed the incident and found no evidence of foul play.

On the surface, this is a minor technical hiccup. Yet the political stage magnifies even the smallest glitches. For Trump, the narrative of being undermined by institutions feeds directly into his campaign rhetoric of persecution and opposition. For the UN, the image of a world leader brought to a halt by faulty machinery underscores ongoing concerns about aging infrastructure and underfunding.

While the facts point to little more than a sensor doing its job, the moment highlights a larger truth: in politics, perception often overshadows reality. A thirty-second stall became international news not because of its substance, but because of its symbolism.

This month's scream? Sometimes the mechanics say more than the politicians. Escalators are built to carry people upward, but when they stop moving, the whole world notices who's left standing still.

Spooky Season Movie Review: The Conjuring Last Rites

The Conjuring: Last Rites succeeds as a heartfelt farewell to Ed and Lorraine Warren, the famously known paranormal investigator. It delivers on the franchise's usual brand of jumpscare and ghouls lurking in the shadows. Its intense moments delivers a love story wrapped in terror. The film pushes the audience into darker, more unsettling territory while never losing sight of its emotional core. Although this chapter doesn't deliver the bone-chilling fear that earlier Conjuring films are known for.

Cardi B's Trial: Am I the Drama?

The Trial
Cardi faced a 24 million dollar lawsuit from security guard Emani Ellis, who claimed the rapper assaulted her outside a Beverly Hills OB-GYN in 2018. The accusations included scratching, spitting, insults, and emotional damage. Cardi denied physical assault but admitted a verbal clash, saying Ellis harassed and filmed her while she was pregnant. On September 2, 2025, the jury deliberated for less than an hour before siding unanimously with Cardi. Translation: Ellis's case had no weight.

Fashion as Evidence
Let's talk about that 10,000 dollar Valentino polka-dot suit. Most defendants try to appear humble. Cardi strutted in like it was Paris Fashion Week. This was not just fashion; it was testimony. Memes instantly crowned her the Elle Woods of 2025. Cardi flipped the courtroom into a runway, turning expectation of shame into a spectacle of defiance.

Allegations vs. Evidence
Ellis brought heavy claims: assault, negligence, false imprisonment, and emotional distress. Cardi's defense was simple. Yes, there was an argument, but no contact. The lightning-fast verdict said it all: Ellis's story lacked credibility. Legal analysts noted such quick decisions usually mean the case was overwhelmingly one-sided. The 24 million dollar ask looked more like a jackpot attempt than justice.

Meme-ification of Justice
The jury was not the only audience. Livestreams and clips flooded TikTok, Twitter, and Instagram, making Cardi's case content for the masses. Her dozing off in court became a meme. Her clapbacks became memes. The trial blurred law and entertainment, turning testimony into theater. This was less about 2018 and more about how the public vibed with Cardi.

The Pivot
Days after her win, Cardi dropped Am I the Drama? with a cheeky Courtroom Edition. She turned a PR risk into revenue, proving celebrity today is not just about surviving scandals but about monetizing them.

- Why It Matters
- Trials as Theater – Celebrity cases now function like cultural events.
 - Weaponized Lawsuits – Fame invites inflated claims.
 - Clout as Currency – Cardi emerged stronger, louder, and even more relevant.

Closing Sip
Cardi did not just beat the case. She staged it, styled it, and sold it. Me? I would be in sweatpants begging Sallie Mae for mercy. Cardi is sipping champagne in Valentino polka dots, asking the eternal question: Am I the drama?

About Horoscopes

You may be wondering, what is a horsoscope?
 Think of a horoscope as your cosmic weather report—except instead of telling you to grab an umbrella, it's like, "Mercury's in retrograde, good luck explaining yourself in that group chat." Some days the forecast is sunny, other days it's a thunderstorm of reality checks, and occasionally the stars just scream "hit snooze, button please?!?"

Basically, your horoscope comes from where the planets are chilling in the sky now compared to where they were when you showed up on Earth. That's why it feels personal, like the cosmos is subtweeting your life choices and you're just here, reading your call-out post in the school paper.

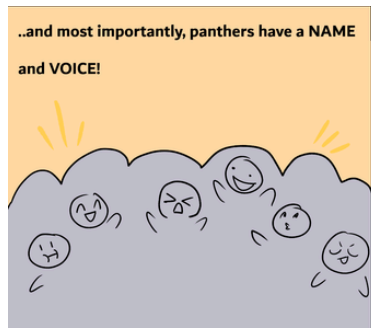

Now so... what's a transit?
 A transit happens when a planet changes position in the sky and lines up with parts of your birth chart. Think of it as cosmic traffic: when a planet pulls onto your street, it changes the mood of the neighborhood.

For example, Saturn is the planet of responsibility. When it rolls through, suddenly you're organizing your Google Drive at 2 a.m., side-eyeing your unfinished homework, or feeling the weight of every "I'll do it later" you ever said. That's a transit; daily life taking on the flavor of whichever planet is in town.

The Monthly Scream: -

This month, Washington’s latest drama isn’t in Congress – it’s under a pile of marble and scaffolding. The White House’s East Wing has officially been demolished to make way for what former President Donald Trump calls “a world-class ballroom worthy of America.”

According to the administration, the $250 million “privately funded” renovation will modernize the property. According to historians, preservationists, and just about everyone with common sense – it’s a demolition of history, both literally and symbolically.

The East Wing, home to decades of presidential archives and the First Lady’s offices, was quietly torn down earlier this fall. Reports show that the project’s funding involves several major corporate donors – particularly from the tech sector – raising concerns about influence and access. Meanwhile, the National Park Service and multiple historic-preservation boards claim they were left out of the decision entirely.

Here’s what’s really at play:

- Legacy Construction. Trump’s critics argue the renovation isn’t about modernization, it’s about memorialization. A gilded ballroom with his name subtly etched in the marble isn’t far off from a monument to self.
- Power Optics. The White House is supposed to symbolize democracy’s openness. Tearing down one of its oldest sections for a luxury expansion – while Americans face housing crises and economic strain – sends a message louder than any press briefing.
- Erasing the Past. When we rebuild the symbols of democracy to fit one man’s taste, we’re not just changing the building – we’re changing what it stands for.

The administration maintains that the renovation “honors American greatness.”

But the irony writes itself: in trying to leave his mark, Trump may have carved out a piece of history that belonged to everyone else.

This month’s scream? You can polish the floors, replace the walls, and hang new chandeliers – but no amount of gold leaf hides the cracks in democracy.

Bad Bunny Super Bowl

Bad bunny, a Puerto Rican artist who has recently made history with his Latin artist awards and latin grammies, has recently stirred up controversy for his upcoming Super Bowl halftime show performance.

Many people have expressed their distaste with the latino artist performing. Many of the complaints include arguments such as bad bunny not being an “American Artist” or that the halftime show needs an “all American” performance. We would like to take this opportunity to discuss the merits of Bad Bunny.

Bad Bunny not being an “American artist” is incorrect. Since the Jones-Shafroth Act of 1917, Puerto Rican citizens were granted U.S citizenship. Puerto Rico is an American territory, therefore, making Bad Bunny an American citizen. In addition to this, the Super Bowl has had previous history of including Latino artists. 10 other Latino artists before him have performed at the halftime show, including: Gloria Estefan, Shakira, Jennifer Lopez, J Balvin, and Enrique Iglesias.

This “controversy” may come from prejudice due to the rising racial tensions there are today. With ICE raids and anti-latino propaganda surfacing, the latino community has been portrayed in sometimes harmful ways. The constant disapproving attitude towards not only immigrants, but latin people themselves, has caused many to approach situations regarding the community with a stereotypical outlook, generating dislike for the community as a whole. One should not stay quiet at the blatant hate being shown to the latin community, whether it is obvious or covered under sugar coated words. Just as the NFL commissioner Roger Goodell is standing firm on Bad Bunny performing during the halftime show; we must follow his example and support our peers who are affected directly or indirectly by the current situation. Not all things are grim. Despite the hateful language, kindness can still overcome.

Cozy Autumn Explorations in Chicago

November in Chicago isn’t just gray skies and early sunsets- it’s a vibe. The city starts to slow down, coffee cups get warmer, and the air starts to smell like woodsmoke and adventure. If you’re ready to explore before Winter takes over, here are a few cozy, camera-worthy spots to check out.

Garfield Park conservatory

Step into the tropical warmth while the world outside freezes. The light through the glass makes every plant look like it’s posing for your camera.

The Riverwalk at Sunset

Bundle up, bring a friend of yours, and watch the skyline reflect in the cold water. Quiet, calm, and perfectly dramatic.

The Book Cella-Lincoln Square

Indie bookstore energy with cozy chairs and good coffee. Bonus points if it’s raining outside.

Pro tip: Grab a friend, a scarf, and a hot drink. Chicago in November isn’t just something to survive- it’s something to feel.

Grandma's Victim: A Recap

Nicki Minaj's "victim of the month" is... surprise surprise: Grammy wielding, streaming dominating, courtroom undefeated Cardi B. At this point, asking "why are they beefing again?" is like asking why Chicago wind hurts. It's not a mystery, it's a lifestyle.

The latest spark lit when Cardi's album hit double platinum and Billboard rolled out the confetti. Nicki responded, not with congratulations, but with tweet encoded shade: "$4.99" Translation: your album is only selling because it's cheap. Then came pregnancy shade, implying Cardi was pulling sympathy streams. Cardi returned fire immediately because she's from the Bronx, where silence is not a coping skill. But Nicki then crossed into unforgivable territory when she started insulting Cardi's children, comparing them to "zoo animals." That's not rap beef. That's ego rot. And the most ironic part is that this meltdown didn't even happen during a slow news day. It was on her own son's birthday, a day she could have spent celebrating him, but instead she was on social media typing multi paragraph tantrums. What a great mother.

And this is where the "oh she's just being petty" excuse stops working. Because when a grown woman cannot celebrate any other woman's success without spiraling into online warfare, we are far past shade. We are watching someone lose the ability to regulate ego.

There are actual psychological parallels here. People do not talk about this in pop culture commentary because everyone is afraid of sounding too serious, but there is a name for what this looks like: ego threat psychosis. That is when someone becomes so internally dependent on being "the top" or "the only" that every rising peer feels like a personal attack. That paranoia turns into obsession, obsession turns into hostility, and hostility turns into manufactured enemies. This is not just drama. It is decline.

Nicki doesn't beef with men. She doesn't go after Drake or Wayne or Kendrick or Jack Harlow. Only women. Only those who are rising now. Only people who might replace her as "the narrative." That is not competition. It is territorial panic. Cardi is just today's target. Before her was Megan. Before her was Latto. Before her was Doja. Before her was Remy. Before her was Lil Kim. Then Ice Spice. Then SZA. Then random TikTok girls who haven't even released a full studio album yet. It is a conveyor belt of insecurity disguised as royalty. Grandma is not gatekeeping. She is glitching. She is not in the "Queen Era," she is in crown clutching cognitive decline era. Instead of therapy, she logs onto X. Instead of self awareness, she livestreams delusion. Instead of addressing aging, she weaponizes it. "the narrative." That is not competition. It is territorial panic.

Horoscope

Nov. 3rd : Mars trine Neptune In scorpio : This is the "you suddenly know what you need to do" energy. Instead of forcing motivation, it feels like inspiration quietly clicks into place, like finally understanding what direction you should push toward (a project, a goal, an internal shift). People notice deeper meaning in their actions today, not just an average routine.

Nov. 4th : Mars enters Sagittarius : Theme: energy turns outward + bold ; Motivation shifts from emotional to action-based. People stop overthinking and start moving. You may feel more outspoken, adventurous, or ready to take initiative. It's "let me actually do something about it" energy.

Nov. 5th : Full Moon in Taurus: Theme: stability, comfort, self-worth, and security; Full Moon brings attention to what actually makes you feel safe emotionally, materially, or physically. People reflect on comfort vs. growth, and whether they're settling or actually building something real.

Nov. 6th : Venus sextile Mars: Theme: attraction + social flow ; This is one of the easiest connection days of the month, people are more open, warm, charismatic, and willing to meet each other halfway. Social interactions feel smoother and more natural.

Nov. 7th : Uranus Retrograde re-enters Taurus: Theme: redefining security + stability Student/life: Brings back unfinished lessons about comfort, worth, resources, and what you rely on-- "Where in your life do you need something more secure, not temporary?" Questioning what has been "Long term"

Panthers End the Season With Heart and Unity

The Golder College Prep Panthers wrapped up an incredible soccer season with unforgettable moments together with amazing teamwork. Even though their run ended with tough losses to Mansueto and IC Catholic, the Panthers proved that their success isn't about the points on the scoreboard but about how they play together as a team.

Fighting Through the Finals

During the regional finals against IC Catholic, the Panthers started the game off strong, holding possession of the ball for much of the first 20. Gael and Angelo made strong connections, keeping the pressure on the defense. After a few challenging plays, IC Catholic got the edge, and Golder faced an uphill battle. Despite a few controversial calls, the Panthers never gave up. The Coach and Captains adjusted the team's formation to press harder in the midfield, demonstrating their ability to adapt and keep fighting until the final whistle.

Battle Against Mansueto

During the Noble League Quarterfinals, Golder faced Mansueto in a game that would show just how determined and motivated the Panthers were. Starting off strong with 50-50 possession, the Panthers showed how their flexibility strengthened their performance on the field. After Mansueto took an early lead, Gael and Tony brought up the energy as they started off the second half scoring. Even during pouring rain, Golder played with their heart, giving their all until the end.

Captainship and Solidarity

Captains: Noah, Manny, and Tony kept up their team's spirits all season. Whether seeing that they were winning or losing, their leadership helped create a positive and supportive bond with their team on and off the field. "No matter winning or losing, we always keep each other up," said Noah. "Our main priority is communication and playing at our own tempo. The team is really close, and that helped us go as far as we did."

Season to Remember

The Panthers ended the year with a 14-4 record, won the Blue Division with a perfect 5-0 run, and competed in the BodyArmor Tournament final and regional finals. Along the way, they built lasting friendships, played with confidence, and showed what a real team looks like.
